

Malö Yachts night sailing in December

For everybody at Malö Yachts quality is the top priority. In order to really understand what is important on board the boats in different conditions the management team of Malö Yachts regularly test sail the boats together in as many varying conditions as possible.

In December this year they undertook a night sail with only compass and paper charts to guide them through impenetrable darkness and rain and with the thermometer showing only one degree Celsius, it may seem that staying behind the desk would be much a better option. A Malö however really comes into its own in this kind of weather. The cockpit well protected beneath the full height cockpit cover and Targa arch, nicely warmed by the heater, clear visibility through the fixed glass windscreen and the coffee brewing on the stove meant we could happily keep up good speed through the Bohuslän archipelago without being cold or wet.

But as always when the Malö management team gets together for a sail there are lots of new ideas and suggestions being thrown about for how construction and details can be changed or improved. Who knows, perhaps we will find some of these new ideas on the future boats to come out of the Malö factory.

Images & text
Kay Kjellgard